

Domestic Abuse Bill Committee Stage Briefing – Drive

About Drive

Drive is a perpetrator intervention that challenges and holds high-harm perpetrators – those who have been assessed as at risk of murdering or seriously harming their partners – to account. It has been developed by the Drive Partnership which brings together domestic abuse specialist organisations, SafeLives and Respect, with not-for-profit innovation organisation, Social Finance. The BBC covered our work here. Drive has been shown by the University of Bristol to improve victim safety and reduce abuse, including police recorded domestic abuse.

Drive is continuing to work during the coronavirus epidemic, indeed our work to manage the risks that perpetrators pose to those around them is more important than ever. There is more information about the costs and benefits of Drive at the bottom of this paper.

Committee Stage Summary for MPs

If you are only raising three things we'd ask you to make the following points:

1. DA perpetrator behaviour change programmes must be available, effective, and safe to ensure Domestic Abuse Protection Orders (DAPOs) have impact. Done well, the new DAPO could be a major contributor to reducing levels of violent crime. However, anyone can set up a behaviour change programme and sell places on it. A system of quality assurance is needed to ensure such programmes improve victim safety and do not do more harm than good (see amendment one below). The whole new system of DAPOs also needs a thorough review after the proposed pilot and before any roll-out. The review should have input from design stage onwards from the DA and Victims Commissioners, specialist DA sector and DA survivors. It may be wise to embed such a review in legislation (amendment two below).
2. The Bill does not provide resources for domestic abuse services. New government money for the corona period is welcome. However, this has to be spent before the end of October so will not respond to the ongoing need. Amendment three below would ensure the Bill fully funds victim and perpetrator provision.
3. Government should publish a domestic abuse perpetrator strategy. This is being widely called for across those involved in the domestic abuse response. In January, around 80 organisations and experts got together to call for a perpetrator strategy. Read it here. We are seeking a commitment from government during the course of debate that they will publish such a strategy.

Amendments we hope you will support

1. Quality assurance to ensure judge mandated programmes do no harm: We are proposing an amendment to Clause 33 to ensure that interventions required as a result of the new DAPO, such as behaviour change programmes ordered by judges, meet a minimum quality standard. This amendment will require the Home Secretary to publish standards (separately from the Bill) which providers of perpetrator programmes must meet. Such standards already exist and could form the backbone of the guidance.

2. An amendment to ensure a transparent and thorough review of DAPOs – with input from design stage onwards from the DA and Victims Commissioners, specialist DA sector and DA survivors, before any national roll out.
3. Statutory duty to provide services: We support Barnardo's amendment to clause 53 calling for a widened statutory duty on public bodies, with the requisite funding, to provide services to victims of domestic abuse, including children and suitable specialist perpetrator responses.

These are our priority amendments. We support a number of others listed in a cross sector briefing to which we have signed up.

Our three asks in more detail: What do we think of the Bill?

We welcome many of the changes in the Bill, including the new definition of Domestic Abuse and improvements to court arrangements for victims.

Whilst the bill makes some progress towards a strategic approach to perpetrators - for example through provisions that could extend the use of DA behaviour change programmes– these provisions are limited and need more work. A much more comprehensive strategy on perpetrators is needed. It is simply impossible to prevent or end domestic abuse without responding to the people causing the harm.

1. DA perpetrator behaviour change programmes must be available, effective, and safe to ensure Domestic Abuse Protection Orders (DAPOs) have impact

Recent data – including the independent evaluation of Drive – has shown that perpetrator interventions can be effective at changing behaviour and making victims safer.

There is a welcome provision in the Bill enabling judges to mandate participation on behaviour change programmes as part of the new DAPOs (DA Protection Orders). However, this is likely to have little, no or even negative effect until such programmes are widely available and quality assured.

a. Availability

Due to limited funding, some areas have no such programmes and no single area in England or Wales has an adequate range or volume of programmes. Less than 1% of perpetrators receive a specialist intervention to address their behaviour.

b. Safety: Quality Assurance

We are also concerned that the Bill is silent on quality control of perpetrator work. This work can be risky both for the professionals involved and if done badly, for the associated victims. If DAPOs do mark the beginning of an area where perpetrators are challenged to change, then the government has a responsibility to ensure this work is a safe and effective.

Strong quality assurance systems for perpetrator work already exist, there is just no requirement in the Bill that they are used. In other words, when a judge orders a perpetrator onto a programme, without an amendment to the Bill, there is no guarantee of the safety or effectiveness of that programme.

c. Guaranteed review of the DAPO pilot

The behaviour change element of DAPOs fit within wider proposals about how DAPOs will work, who can apply for them (not just police), victim consent, how notice is served on a perpetrator etc. There are concerns about the detail of how this will work, and potential unintended consequences that could be harmful for the victim. This is one of the reasons that they are being piloted. A thorough review of DAPOs is needed – involving the DA commissioner and input from survivors – before any national roll-out. It may be sensible to fix the requirement for such a review in the legislation.

2. Resources – coronavirus and beyond

We welcome the government’s willingness to fund an additional response to cope with a corona-related surge in demand. Whilst the majority of this money has not yet reached the sector (and sadly most services cannot surge provision until the money lands), the corona impact may last months rather than weeks, so it is still useful. As lockdown eases, we may find additional people seeking help who felt unable to do so whilst ‘trapped’ at home.

The Chancellor announced £10million for perpetrator work in his budget in March. This was very welcome and we hope will stimulate some important work. However, this money has to be spent by spring 2021, and therefore does not provide the long-term response needed to go hand-in-hand with the provisions in the Bill. Resources are needed in the longer term.

The government’s impact assessment for the Bill estimates that the new DAPOs will generate a need for 15,200 extra places on behaviour change and drug and alcohol programmes. The average quality assured perpetrator programme costs between £1500-£2200 to deliver. If just a third of these programmes were DA behaviour change programmes and taking the low end of the unit cost scale, the legislation will call for at least an extra £7.5m annual spend on DA behaviour change programmes. There is a strong financial case for this spend, thanks to evidence – from programmes like Drive – pointing to reductions in re-offending.

3. The need for a perpetrator strategy

Domestic abuse is form of violent crime. Over a third of all ‘violence against the person’ crimes recorded by police are domestic abuse.¹ If we want to make progress on reducing violent crime (as per the Prime Minister’s 20% reduction target) we need to think about reducing domestic abuse, not just responding to it once it has already happened. There are proven ways of doing this.

Perpetrator interventions: The Drive Project has been shown to reduce the number of perpetrators using physical abuse by 82% and jealous and controlling behaviour by 73%. It is similarly effective at reducing other types of abuse.

Drive is for perpetrators who have been assessed as posing a very high risk. There are other evaluated programmes responding effectively to perpetrators at both high and lower risk levels. Domestic Violence Perpetrator Programmes (DVPP) use group work to change attitudes and challenge behaviour. Early intervention programmes build communities' ability to recognise abusive behaviour and get help. Yet there are no government proposals on the table for any national strategy to make this range of crucial interventions available everywhere.

Changing the public narrative and upskilling professionals: There has been important work funded by government on identifying victims of domestic abuse early, but less on perpetrators. We need to kick off a national conversation that gives people the confidence to say to their friends “actually, that’s not ok” when they come across abusive behaviour. We also need to upskill a range of professionals – whether GPs or housing officers – to recognise signs of abusive and controlling behaviour and know what next steps to take. The Welsh government is ahead of England in this respect with published guidance for public servants.

These changes need to be brought together in a Perpetrator Strategy for England and Wales. Over 80 organisations have signed up to a ‘call to action’, asking the government to publish such a strategy. This call has also been supported by the DA commissioner, the CPS, the Victims Commissioner for London, the Association of PCCs and the Royal College of GPs.

More information about costs of Drive

Research by Bristol University has found that under the status quo, a perpetrator who has been assessed as high risk and whose case is heard at MARAC (a multi-agency risk assessment conference for victims), generates costs of £63,000 as a result of his/her DA behaviour. This cost is made up of costs to police, the justice system, health and other public services. The average perpetrator studied was heard at MARAC over three times in a period of around two years. Responding to perpetrators time and time again is very expensive. Drive – which has an operational cost of £1800-£2000 per perpetrator – reduces abuse and the number of times perpetrators are heard at MARAC. The study also found that Drive reduced the other (non-domestic abuse) offending behaviour of perpetrators.

Drive reduces abuse.
